JUDY looked at her party preparations with a critical eye. Everything seemed to be in order, with plenty of refreshments to see the whole gang through a long evening of television. Orange fizz punch. Tasty sandwiches. Nuts, candies, and her mother's best cookies. The television set was in perfect working order, and all available chairs, footstools, hassocks, and benches in the house had been placed advantageously in front of the big 18-inch screen. Everything was tip-top as far as Judy could see, but she decided to check with her mother just to make sure.

"Do you really think my party will be a success, Mother?" she asked. "I mean, is there anything I could possibly have forgotten?"

"No, I don't think so, Judy," said Mrs. Foster. "It seems to me you've taken care of just about everything. I don't see how your guests could help but have a good time!"

"I hope you're right!" said Judy. "After all, this is the first television party anyone in my crowd has given and I'd just die dead if it didn't go over big! Suppose—suppose things should go wrong—?"

"It's up to you as a good hostess not to let things go wrong," said Mrs. Foster. "Meet every party emergency as it arises with intelligence and cheerfulness and you'll be all right. After all, the secret of any party's success is really very simple—just make every guest as happy as you possibly can!"

"I'll be sure to remember that," promised Judy. "I love to make people happy." She picked up the newspaper and for the next half hour busied herself with marking out the best programs offered that evening. By the time she was through, the first guests had begun to arrive, and Mr. and Mrs. Foster and Randolph had left for a short visit to Aunt Helen's. Judy named noses as they arrived and soon found everybody present—Oogie, Elmo, Mitzi, Tootsie, Gene, Zena, Martha, Jay, Mary, John, Sylvia, Larry and all the others. Everyone helped himself to a big, cool glass of punch from the tray on the buffet and then settled down on the chair of his choice. Judy had placed big plates of sandwiches and cookies strategically all over the room, so that no one had any trouble reaching them.

"Boy, Judy," said Oogie enthusiastically, "this is a terrific idea! It's one date with Judy I don't mind sharing with the rest of the gang!"

"Leave it to Judy to be the first to spring something new in the crowd!" said Mitzi admiringly. "This is better than a theater party any day!"

"I'll say!" said Elmo, helping himself to a pile of sandwiches. "Who serves eats at a theater? There! Five sandwiches ought to hold me through the first program!"

"Okay, everybody!" cried Judy with a big smile. "It's time to begin, so just sit tight while I tune in our first program! And of course you all know what that is!"

"Of course!" whooped Hal.

"Sure thing!" agreed Zena.

"Yippee!" yelled Larry.

"Start tuning!" urged Sylvia.

"Hurry up—we don't want to miss any of it!" pleaded Beverly.

"Okay, okay," smiled Judy. "Just hold your horses a second till I—" She turned the television set on and proceeded to set it. "Let's see—" she murmured, "—the World of Theatre programs comes on right about here—"

"The World of Theatre programs?!!" exclaimed Oogie. "But—"

"But—but—" said Mary.

"But—but—but—" said John.

"But what?" asked Judy, straightening up from the television set and staring at them.

"But I thought we were going to watch the boxing matches at the arena tonight!" said Larry.

"Boxing matches?!!" countered Zena with scorn. "I should hope not! I thought it was going to be the Video Fashion Show! It's definitely the best thing on at this hour!"

"Aw, who wants to watch a bunch of models parading around?" scoffed Jay. "Nossir! That's not for me! I want to watch the Kid Ranger program! Ride 'em, cowboy! YA-HOOO!"

"Cowboys!" sniffed Martha. "Give me something constructive any day—like the telecasts of the UN proceedings! I'm going to run for senator after I get my law degree and I should know about such things as the UN."

"Well," said Letitia vehemently. "I plan to be a dancer someday, so I've just got to watch the ballet performance tonight! It's crucial to my career!"

"Ballet—phooey!" said Gene. "I'd rather watch that swell new comedian they've got on the Variety Revue! He's the best show in town!"

"He is not!" contradicted Mary. "The Dog Show is! And this is the first time it's being televised and I've been looking forward to watching it all day!"

"Dogs! Clowns! Dancers!" snorted John. "They're all a waste of time! Now, you take the Aquarium Show where they show different kinds of fish and give lectures on them—"

"I CAN'T take it!" protested Beverly. "I HATE fish! I want to watch—"

"PLEASE! PLEASE!" cried Judy desperately. "This is TERRIBLE! Nobody wants to watch the same program! At this rate, I'd have to have twenty television sets in the house to please you all! Oh, golly, what am I going to do—" Suddenly a bright smile came over her face as a thought struck her. "Listen, everybody!" she announced. "I've just had a wonderful idea—"

A half hour later when Mr. and Mrs. Foster and Randolph returned from Aunt Helen's, they found Judy all alone in the living room, a glass of orange fizz punch in her hand and a couple of sandwiches on a plate beside her, watching the last act of the World of Theater program. "Oh, hi, Mother! Hi, Father! Randy!" she greeted them gaily as they entered. "Come on in and join the party!"

"Party?" exclaimed Mr. Foster. "What party? Looks to me as if it's kind of fizzled out!"

"Too bad, dear," consoled Mrs. Foster. "I guess the idea of a television party wasn't so good after all, was it?"

"Oh, but it was, Mother, indeed it was!" smiled Judy. "Of course, I had a little difficulty at first, being that nobody wanted to watch the same program. But, fortunately, I met the emergency with intelligence and cheerfulness. I simply divided all the refreshments up evenly between them and sent everybody home to watch their favorite program on their own set! The party's still going on and everybody's having a wonderful time!"
