PUBLISHED AS A PUBLIC SERVICE IN COOPERATION WITH THE NATIONAL SOCIAL WELFARE ASSEMBLY, COORDINATING ORGANIZATION FOR NATIONAL HEALTH, WELFARE AND RECREATION AGENCIES OF THE U. S.

“WHAT are you doing, Judy?” asked Randolph, wandering into the kitchen, where Judy was busy at the kitchen table with scissors, tape, brush and paint.

“I’m making a Conscience Box,” said Judy, deftly putting a slit in the lid of a large box. “In case you don’t know, a Conscience Box is a place for people with guilty consciences to get rid of them by fining themselves whatever their consciences tell them they ought to be fined for doing whatever it was that gave them the guilty conscience in the first place! Understand?”

“No,” said Randolph. “Cut that explanation down to my size, will you? I feel unusually frail today!”

“It’s really very simple, Randolph,” said Judy, taping the lid securely down on the box. “Didn’t you read that story in the newspaper about that little town that has a Conscience Box for traffic violators? It seems there are no city laws that provide for the fining of traffic violators, so when some driver does something wrong, like parking overtime, for instance, the town leaves it up to the culprit’s own conscience to decide what he should put in the Conscience Box as a fine! This one’s going into the living room!” She picked up the lettering brush and began printing large, black letters on the side of the box. J—U—

“I don’t get it,” said Randolph. “There’s nobody parking overtime in our living room—unless it’s Oogie, of course! Sometimes I think he’s NEVER going home!”

“This Conscience Box has nothing to do with Oogie or traffic regulations,” said Judy. “It’s strictly in the family!” She finished lettering the side of the box. “Come on into the living room and I’ll explain everything!”

Randolph followed Judy into the living room, where she placed the box on the most centrally located table in the room. Mr. and Mrs. Foster looked up from their game of double solitaire and read the lettering on the side of the box: JUDY’S CONSCIENCE BOX. “Goodness me!” exclaimed Mrs. Foster. “What’s that?”

“Everybody listen carefully and I’ll explain,” said Judy. “I just can’t bear to think of any of you going around with a guilty conscience just on account of something you might have said or done to me at some time. So I’ve made this little Conscience Box, so that any of you who feel you ought to make amends toward me for some reason or another can do so to the tune of whatever you think it’s worth. Just slip it into my Conscience Box here and your conscience will be clear once and for all! Isn’t that grand?”

“It’s the silliest thing I ever heard of!” exclaimed Mr. Foster. “I haven’t a thing to make amends for! My conscience is perfectly clear!”

"So is mine!" said Mrs. Foster.

"Same here!" said Randolph.

"I didn't say anybody actually was guilty, did I?" said Judy. "I just said IN CASE!" She settled down in a chair with her knitting, while Randolph began reading a book, and Mr. and Mrs. Foster resumed their game of double solitaire.

"I was just wondering," said Judy, thoughtfully, "what ever happened to those six cookies left over from the party the other night. . . ."

There was a long silence. Randolph stirred uncomfortably. "So I took them!" he said at last. "So what?"

"So nothing," said Judy sweetly. "I just thought we always split fifty-fifty on such deals, that's all!"

Randolph said nothing. He tried to read some more. He couldn't. "Oh, for cow's sake!" he said at last putting his book down and walking over to Judy's Conscience Box. "All this over a few cookies! Here's fifteen cents! That ought to square things!" He dropped a nickel and a dime in the box.

"Thank you, Randolph," said Judy. "You must feel much, much better already!"

Randolph looked darkly at Judy, shrugged and returned to his reading. Then Judy turned to her mother. "You're looking awfully well these days, Mother," she said. "It must be all that tennis you played last summer with my racquet! My, that racquet certainly took a beating!"

Mrs. Foster played a red ten on a red jack. She dropped several cards on the floor. She leaned down to pick them up and dropped several more. "Really, Judy," she said, "I can't see that I—that is, it seems to me—well, I never played that much—oh well, what's the use of quibbling!" She got a dollar bill from her purse and dropped it into Judy's Conscience Box. "I didn't realize I had been so hard on your racquet, Judy," she said, "but I really feel that a dollar's more than enough to compensate you for the damage!"

"Thank you, Mother," smiled Judy. "I never gave it a thought, really, but I know it must make you very happy to have it off your mind at last!"

"As I said," proclaimed Mr. Foster loudly, "my conscience is perfectly clear!"

"How nice, Father," said Judy. "By the way, I was over at Tootsie's the other day and her little sister has a doll just like that doll I used to have—you remember, the one you broke!"

"That—that was an accident!" said Mr. Foster defensively. "Of course, of course!" said Judy. "Besides, you were about ready to give up playing with dolls when it happened," said Mr. Foster. "Um . . ." said Judy. "Anyway, dolls were a lot cheaper then," said Mr. Foster. "Uhm . . ." said Judy. "And you've got to allow for depreciation," said Mr. Foster. "You'd had that doll for a long time, you know!" "Uhm . . ." said Judy.

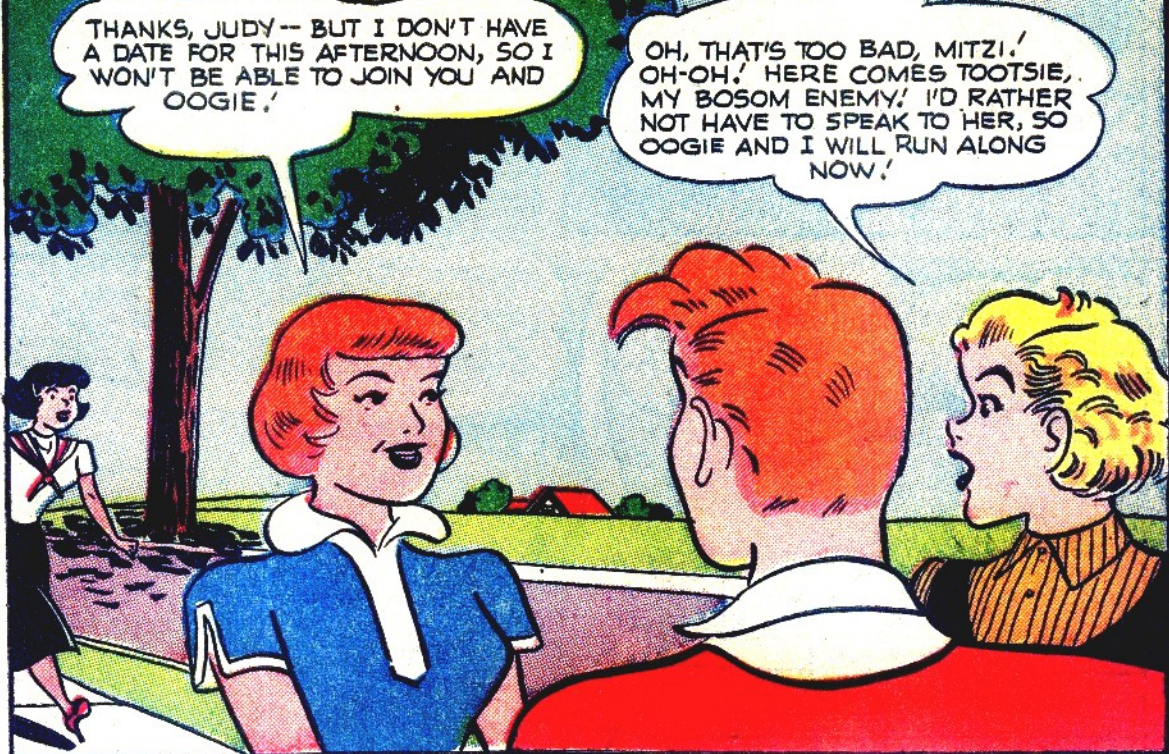

Mr. Foster walked over to Judy's Conscience Box with an air of reluctant defeat. "Two dollars is my limit!" he declared, slipping two dollar bills into the box. "And it's a hold-up at that!"

"Nobody's forcing you, Father," said Judy, "—except your conscience, of course! Now, Randolph, do you remember that time you borrowed my bike and—"

A half hour and a dozen consciences later Judy put down her knitting with a triumphant little smile, picked up the Conscience Box and opened it. "My goodness!" she exclaimed happily. "Who'd ever have guessed there were so many guilty consciences around this place! There's five dollars and ten cents in this box—just enough to buy me that yummy blouse in Carter's window! I just knew I could get that money if I really tried! I'm going right down to get it!" She hurried out the door and headed downtown.

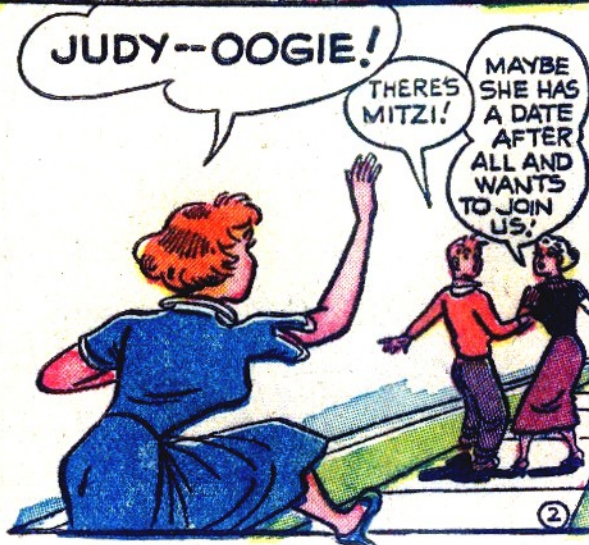

A few minutes later she was back, empty-handed and considerably subdued. "I—I didn't get the blouse," she said sheepishly. "I couldn't! There I was, ready to hand the money across the counter and talk about CONSCIENCE BOXES, mine sure does! It gave me the drubbing of my life! Here—here's your money back! What a FINE idea this turned out to be!"
