LIGHTFOOT OOGIE

JUDY, Oogie, Mitzi, and Elmo were having a sociable soda together at the Pop Bottle when all the trouble started. They were talking about the Holiday Hop coming up in a couple of weeks, and the first thing anyone knew, Judy and Mitzi were off.

"Will you ever forget last year's Holiday Hop, Mitzi?" sighed Judy. "That was really something!"

"I know just who you mean!" Mitzi sighed back. "I'll never forget him as long as I live!"

"Who do she mean—I mean who does she mean?" demanded Oogie, curiosity and irritation intermingled in his voice.

"Why, who else but Barry Newton?" sighed Judy in dreamy recollection.

"Who else, indeed?" nodded Mitzi.

"I don't get it!" shrugged Elmo.

"Me, either!" said Oogie. "What's so great about Barry Newton? He's just another guy—like the rest of us!"

"Hah!" said Judy.

"Hah!" said Mitzi.

"They're laughing," Oogie said to Elmo.

"But we're not!" said Elmo.

"Oh, please!" said Judy. "Can't you tell a laugh from a swoon? Mitzi and I and every other girl within a thousand miles of Barry Newton are absolutely swoony about him!"

"Well, suppose you make a big effort to come out of your swoon long enough to tell us why!" suggested Oogie drily.

"Because of the way he dances, of course!"

said Judy, as if it were the most elementary sort of knowledge, like snow is white, or one and one makes two. "Barry Newton is without doubt the best dancer in these parts! Ask any girl!"

"Ask me!" volunteered Mitzi. "I can tell you there's just no one like him! And I had two dances with him at the Holiday Hop last year!"

"So did I!" sighed Judy. "I'll never forget it—never!"

Oogie growled. "I think this is all a lot of fancy talk designed to frustrate the average male—meaning Elmo and me!"

"No, it isn't, Oogie," said Judy. "It's fact, not fancy! Barry Newton is the lightest boy on his feet that I've—"

"And just what's the matter with my feet," demanded Oogie. "Aren't I light on them?"

"Well—I—I—you're not exactly heavy on your feet," hedged Judy, "but you're not exactly light, either! At least not the way Barry Newton is!"

"Well, I like that!" snorted Oogie. "If you don't like the way I dance, how come you're always so eager to go dancing with me?"

"Now, Oogie, don't get mad," said Judy placatingly. "I like you, and I like to go dancing with you—but that doesn't mean I think you're the best dancer in the world! However, you do have one thing that's very much to your credit. . . ."

"Yeah?" said Oogie, miffed. "And just what would that be?"

"Well, even though you're not especially light on your own feet," she explained sweetly, "you're really quite light on mine—and I really do appreciate that!"

"Oh, so now you're giving me a pat on the back for not trampling you to smithereens!" snorted Oogie. "Well, thanks, thanks very much!"

"Oogie, don't be so sensitive!" pleaded Judy. "I—"

"Light on his feet—HAH!" growled Oogie. "What does that mean, anyway? I can be light on my feet anytime I want to be! Look, I'll show you!" He whipped a pocket flashlight out of his pocket, snapped it on, and perched it on the top of his shoe. "There!" he crowed in vengeful triumph. "Light on my feet!"

"Oh, come now, Oogie!" sighed Judy. "There's no need to—"

"Wait, wait—I haven't finished yet!" Oogie dashed across the Pop Bottle to where Mrs. Grant and Mrs. Willard were treating their baby offspring to ice cream cones. "Mind if I borrow your balloon, honey?" he said to little Susie Grant, helping himself to the big, red balloon tied to her stroller. "Yours, too, sonny!" he said to little Bobby Willard. Quickly Oogie leaned down and tied the two balloons to his ankles. "There!" he bleated happily, "ballooning" back to his own table. "Light on my feet! Light as air! Ha-HAH!"

"Oh, really, Oogie!" Judy shook her head in despair.

"You've seen nothing yet! Absolutely nothing!" whooped Oogie. He rushed outside and was back a moment later with a piece of chalk borrowed from the Carson twins, who were playing hopscotch on the sidewalk. Quickly Oogie smeared the white chalk all over his brown oxfords. "Voila!" he whooped. "Light on my feet!"

"Oogie! That's not funny!" protested Judy indignantly. "Come on—let's go home!" She headed posthaste out of the Pop Bottle, Oogie prancing impishly by her side, with Elmo and Mitzi left behind. "Let them go," sighed Elmo, preparing to settle the bill. "This has gone beyond our poor power to add or detract! They must find their own way out of it!"

On the street Oogie continued to prance.

"Look, Judy!" he cried. "I'm light on my feet! Light—light—light—"

"Yes, Oogie, I see," said Judy, with elaborate patience. "Now calm down before—"

"—light—light—light—" cried Oogie, expanding his prance to a light and airy leap down Main Street. "Have you ever in all your life seen anyone so light—so very, very light?"

"No, Oogie, never. Now—"

Oogie leapt even more lightly and airily, his arms flailing the air about him like a desperate windmill. His chest was high and forward, arrowing into space before him, his head thrown back like a flying Mercury! "—light—light—light—"

"OOGIE! WATCH OUT!"

CRRRASHHHH! It was too late. Oogie had already landed head over heels on top of Billy Norman's bicycle parked at the curb.

Blearily, he disentangled himself from the confusing melange of spokes and wheels and handlebars that constitute a bicycle. Judy hovered anxiously beside him, lending a helping hand. "Oh, Oogie, are you all right?" she cried.

"S-sure, I'm all right," he gasped manfully. He groaned as Judy lifted him to his feet. "N-now are you—convinced—I'm—light on my—feet?" he asked.

"Oh, yes, of course, Oogie, most certainly!" Judy laboriously hooked his arm around her shoulder. "There now, Oogie, I'll just support you a bit. . . ."

"Am—am I—the lightest guy—on his feet—you've ever known?" demanded Oogie between gasps and groans.

"Oh, yes, definitely," said Judy. "Now, please try to lean on me as much as possible."

"A-and on your feet, too?" he persisted.

"Yes, on my feet, too, Oogie! Er—try not to strain yourself any more than necessary. . . ."

"Judy," said Oogie, as they hobbled down Main Street together, "Judy, I love you!"

"I know, Oogie," said Judy softly, her lips breaking into a tender smile. "That's exactly what you've been telling me ever since this began!"
